David Gillespie can clearly talk (and write), which as a lawyer is hardly a surprise. The way he marshals his evidence is quite frightening. When you read what 'food' is doing to you, you'll be shocked. If anything can persuade you to cut down on the evil white powder, this probably has the best chance of doing so.

David Gillespie has a very useful point to make regarding the current proliferation of various seed oils used in processed foods. But his efforts to discredit scientists in other areas of nutrition weaken it. I think his position would have actually been stronger and more convincing if he had not followed what I, probably somewhat naively ...
