The Mamlūk sultans introduced a new feature on the coinage: they engraved their coats of arms on their coins, mostly on the copper fulūs, but sometimes also on the gold and silver. Representations of animals, plants or inanimate objects already occur on many copper coins of the Umayyad caliphs; these latter are, however, purely ornamental and have no heraldic meaning.

The copper coinage introduced by Baybars must have been popular and convenient for the daily needs of the people. Unlike the heavy pictorial copper dirhams of the Zangids and Artuqids, the Bahri Mamluks' copper fulus were only a token currency with purely local value and circulation, and with limited purchasing power.

Because 75% of the coins were Egyptian, and two of the Armenian specimens had Egyptian surcharge, it can be concluded that this hoard represents a sample of coins in circulation in Egypt during the 14 th century, before they reached their burial spot on the long journey along the Silk Road. The Arabic surcharge on two of the takvorin specimens ...

A SMALL HOARD OF ARMENIAN AND MAMLUK COINS FOUND IN PAKISTAN

The copper was bought from the Venetians, who obtained it from mines in Eastern Europe. Small copper coins, based on Byzantine issues and called fals, or fulus in the plural, had been known in the early centuries of Islam but had then virtually disappeared - though fulus still means "money" in colloquial Arabic today. The reinstitution of a copper coinage during late Mamluk times was directly related to the sudden scarcity of silver.
